Doing Life: a seminar

Many of us have been raised in the notion that "Life" is something that happens to us. That idea defines us as helpless victims of Life. and steals our power to create reality/experience of life. Power resides in the content of Life as something you do.

What happens - happens. What you do in response is how we ~~are~~ create the world we personally and collectively occupy.

It's not a matter of 'good' and 'bad'.
It's a matter of whether and to what degree [redacted] actions/behavior/etc. meshes harmoniously with other systems.

What defines a healthy organism/system
" " " biological system
" " " neurological system

the one thing I can really be sure of is that I'm confused.

If you observe people carefully you will see that most of them (& probably including yourself) a unconscious robots 99.9% of the time.

If you don't like this or don't believe it, etc. you may leave now because everything else depends on this. The whole point of this is, "How do we move from 99.9 to 99.0

If you were actually conscious 10min in. 24hrs. that would be .69% p (less than 1%)

You begin by being able to distinguish when you consciously in control and when you're not. This is not easy to do. But since you're unconscious most of the time, that's a good place to begin.

In what form might you receive a satisfactory answer

Some times an answer to a verbal question will not appear in a verbal format.

e.g. the difference between a Zen (1) master's and an Episcopelian (2) Bishop's answer to the question, "What is pain?"

of course, sometimes a satisfactory "answer" may be discovered/created in the domain of language

Monty Python is uncomfortable for many people because it makes fun of the parts of us that we are afraid we are. It makes us conscious of our images that haunt us that we invented (and may dis-invent.)
We identify with both slimey Mike and St. John simultaneously thus confirming multiple, semiautonomous, 'personalities'.

Auto accidents/seat belts/questions LHJ

~~People used to~~
Until recently, no one asked, "Why do people die in accidents?" the 'crash' caused the injuries but the mechanics of the injuries wasn't questioned. Some genius asked himself, "What, specifically, causes the injuries?" Answer — bouncing around inside the car. Seat belts have reduced injuries significantly. Some one had to see and comment on the obvious. That's genius.

PRODUCING CONSISTENT RESULTS IN UNPREDICTABLE DISCIPLINES

Bob Shaw had been doing it for years. A psychiatrist trained at the University of Pennsylvania and Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York, he had also served as Director of Family and Children's Mental Health Programs at Lincoln Hospital Community Mental Health Center in New York before coming to California in 1970 to be a founder and Director of the Herrick-Berkeley Mental Health Center. He had long since ceased to be satisfied with a growing and successful practice. The game now was to discover what it was that made his work so successful, so that whatever it was could be taught and made available to others.

With his wife Judith, a clinical psychologist, he had set up the Family Institute of Berkeley to explore what, precisely, allowed for the impact that successful therapy made. How was it that someone could come in with a problem he or she had been carrying around for years and frequently to be able to deal with it effectively after only one or two sessions?

Psychotherapy is a relatively young science. Sigmund Freud, its founding father, wrote "Interpretation of Dreams" only 88 years ago. Today a wide range of theories and techniques have been developed and advanced to treat emotional problems. In the United States alone there are thousands of licensed, practicing psychiatrists and psychologists and countless thousands of other professionals trained to deal with mental health problems. Yet most of them would admit that therapy is far from an exact science with predictable, consistent results.

Can one identify what it is that makes an effective therapist effective? For Bob Shaw, training in theory and technique alone seemed insufficient answers. After 88 years of excellent and dedicated work by brilliant minds, the realm of technique seemed to have been thoroughly explored. Further inquiry into this area did not seem likely to produce any earth-shaking results.

So he began studying therapists with national or international reputations for handling difficult cases successfully, yet who shared no commonality in technique or theory. What were the underlying assumptions and qualities these profesisonals brought to their work? What Bob found was a set of assumptions which the therapists were often unaware they held that seemed to be universally consistent with successful therapy.

1. Patients have all the resources they need to handle the problems for which they seek therapy;
2. There is no intrinsic limit to the possibility of radically transforming the ability of the patient to deal constructively with their problems even though the problems are difficult and painful.
3. Each encounter with the patient has the possibility of being one in which a radical restructuring could take place.
4. Nothing from the past necessarily controls present behavior. Shifts in behavior can take place from restructuring present ideas or from bringing into awareness the source of current behavior. In other words, nothing underlies the current situation but attitudes and thoughts which currently exist.
5. There is no necessary time interval for the result to take place. It may take time, even a long time, but at each moment, the restructuring of problems and points of view is considered to be a possibility in the next.
6. Symptoms always represent solutions to problems and serve to protect the patient against some fantasized negative state which they are trying to avoid. Therefore, there is always some aspect of the total personality which supports the maintenance of the so-called "symptom" until another solution can be found to the problem which can be maintained at lower cost. Often the problem for which the "symptom" is a solution can be restructured so as not to be an issue or to require any solution at all.
7. There is no absolute causal relationship between any complex of thought or emotion and behavior. Things may be painful or difficult but ultimately the patient is at choice about what they do.
8. Habits and patterns are not "thing-like" or considered to be fixed or rigid structures. The therapist does not reify historical records of thought and behavior. They are treated as simply that which has gone before. The future remains open as a possibility.
9. Personality and character are treated as fluid reaction patterns rather than as fixed structures.
10. History is treated as that which has happened and is not flung forward into the future. The future does not have to be a replay of the past. The future is seen as a possibility for action which will then form a new history.
11. The present circumstances of the patient, whether individual, couple, or family, including thoughts, feelings, and history of behavior is always an opportunity for a breakthrough into a creative self-expression that was not available to the patient before. In the preferred strategy for change is to remove the barriers to restructuring — don't add 'pressure' to change.

CONTEXTUAL STUDY

fact, the current difficulties could be the doorway to an expanded ability to deal with life.

12. Each person is the author and responsible person for an interpretation and reaction to his or her circumstances. In the words of Huxley, "experience is not what happens to you, but what you do with what happens to you."

Bob now began experimenting with the possibilities that arose when he operated deliberately as though these assumptions were true, and he watched to see what effect was produced. From what he saw he developed the model for a discipline that he named Contextual Therapy. Simply stated, Contextual Therapy holds that:

a.) The patient's assumptions are at variance with those listed above. By and large, all complaints can be viewed from two broad points of view.

- Things are going wrong. That is, the circumstances of life are impairments to well being rather than opportunities for growth and development.
- Powerless in the situation, the patient attributed his or her condition to defects in power, skill, knowledge, and personality. Power is projected onto the characters in the drama of the persons's life, e.g., boss, spouse, parent, etc.

b.) The "problem" exists only in the set of assumptions from which the patient structures that area of his or her life.

c.) The therapist generates an interaction with the patient by questioning the basis for the assumptions that hold the "problem" in place.

Gregory Bateson raised the interesting notion that what the patient and often the therapist call a problem could be thought of as a problem about which they have a problem. In other words, a problem is one that we feel should not be there or with which we should not have to deal.

Contextual Therapy finds that the assumptions, presuppositions, and maps that patients have of life are fairly easy to alter. For the most part held unconsciously, these assumptions are not usually questioned by the people who have them. When the assumptions are raised up for scrutiny,* the patient has the opportunity to weigh the costs and benefits attached to holding a particular set of assumptions, beliefs, etc. The patient can see the implications and is able to be brought to choice in the matter.

d.) When the patient views the situation as having arisen as a natural consequence of his or her behavior and attitudes, and at the same time becomes aware of the possibility of developing new and creative ways of being and operating, the problem becomes simply a problem in living like any other problem. Life may not be the way one thinks it should be, but one is willing to interact constructively with life the way it is.

e.) At this point the work on this issue is complete until the patient runs into a new sticking point. In other words, the patient, in his or her efforts to deal with the situation, is now in the same trial and error learning process that exists in life for all of us and is a part of the human condition.

Meanwhile, across the bay in San Francisco, Werner Erhard was developing a technology of transformation—the ability to generate context in day-to-day living and operate consistently from it. Bob had taken The est Training in 1972 and found it enormously empowering in his life and practice and had used its principles in the development of Contextual Therapy.

"After all the years Werner and I had known each other and studied each other's work," Bob said recently, "it seemed inevitable that we would work together in the field of psychotherapy. I had developed Contextual Therapy and then Werner created the idea of mastery as a context from which one could come to their work, so we empowered the whole thing."

* this process must be reinforced intensely/persistently/etc. for a period of time (21 days?) (28 days?) (1 moon)

In February of 1981, The Center for Contextual Study was born and began offering Mastery: A Context for the Practice of Psychotherapy. This seven-day course does not offer alternative ways of doing therapy, but rather trains the participants in operating from the contextual model of therapy in a way that empowers the training they have already received. They begin by examining the assumptions on which their present therapy is based.

"We all come to almost every situation in life with presuppositions—that which we see as possible," Bob said recently. "This condition is so pervasive that it limits what we consider to be possible. It is so pervasive because we are unaware of it. Illuminating these hidden assumptions frees people to operate well beyond the limits they formerly placed on themselves and empowers them to use the techniques and skills they already possess.

"It's a shift from technical to creative artistry. All artists use and are masters of technique. But they are not slaves to it. They operate with a lot of freedom."

Bob is careful to point out, however, that there are various levels of freedom and that the study and practice of contextual principles is demanding and rigorous.

"Take mathematics—numbers are very basic, simple, accessible, and understandable, too. They can, however, also be dealt with at a level of abstraction that is enormously complex.

"Mastery, for example, is a much more complex issue of contextual freedom. It really is the ability to declare oneself the source of results. It's not some cheap gimmick. We forget how rare it is for people to be willing to say—well, I think the Psalm of David is a perfect example: 'The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. . . .' In a religious context, he's really saying, 'All circumstances will get me there. I guarantee it.'

"Can we say that? Can we say with absolute assurance, how something will turn out? How many of us live from those kinds of presuppositions about who we are, about what order of being we are? In our courses, we have people take that apart for themselves and find out.

The Center for Contextual Study is currently offering two weekend workshops in addition to the longer, in-depth course. These are Introduction to the Principles of Contextuality, and Introduction to the Principles of Contextual Therapy. (See box) These shorter courses serve both as an introduction to the workshop for those who are uncertain about its benefits and provide an initial education in contextual therapy for professionals who live in areas where it would be impractical to offer a full workshop.

Interestingly enough, some business executives and professional people found their way into the workshop and it turned out to be extremely valuable for them.

"These principles work wherever communication is the issue—whether it's a therapist and patient, or a professional who is consulting with a partner, a client, or a student. For example, Werner and I agreed we should offer The Principles of Contextuality course in Chicago for a broad range of professionals since this work is so applicable to so many fields. In fact, from time to time we will be making courses available to the professional community at large as an opportunity for more people to become familiar with our work and the contribution contextuality can make to their work."

The original course offered by the Center, Mastery: A Context for the Practice of Psychotherapy has been offered in eight cities in the United States. Its participants make up a thriving network of therapists and health professionals who report remarkable results.

Among the major results reported are: an ease and naturalness in sessions with patients with fewer and briefer impasses, less resistance from patients and more active participation with the therapy and therapist, and perhaps most significantly, a much greater feeling of freedom and creativity on the part of the therapist along with higher and more consistent results and a decreased tendency to "burn out."

Bob credits this success to the work he and Werner have done in applying the abstractions and principles of context to the field of psychotherapy. "We make very careful distinctions in the domain of knowing as concept, experience, and context. This is not some mystical thinking. This is a real breakthrough from the domain of philosophy into the domian of psychiatry. The real question we ask is not how do you get what you want, but what do you really want."

MAKING AND KEEPING PROMISES

This is an abbreviated version of a talk by Werner Erhard in a recent meeting with staff members of Werner Erhard and Associates.

In my work on the nature of organization, I've been looking at what it is that is really distinctive about this organization. What I've come up with, at least in the interim, is that this is an organization in which people are invited to live as their word.

Living as your word has to do with making —or not making—promises. Most people probably spend very little time thinking about promising as a crucial issue in their lives. But if you stop for a moment to examine what happens when you make a promise, you discover something interesting.

What actually shows up for you when you are making a promise? Not afterward when you describe it, but what happens right in the moment of making the promise? Especially if the promise is one with teeth in it, one that you know you'll be held to account for.

One of the first things people often say they notice is fear. That is a natural enough statement to make, given all the implications we bring to the word "promise." But is what you notice really fear? You may have the bodily sensations that usually pass for fear, but in the domain of language, "fear," like "emotion," is an interpretation. It is a rather inexact description of various internal states.

To be more exact, you might say that as you make a promise what shows up is, "I can't keep my promise," or even more precisely, "Can I be trusted to keep my promise?" Look for yourself and see if it isn't possible that what you say to yourself—when you make a promise carefully and consciously—is, "Am I going to do it? Can I be trusted? Do I have what it takes?"

In an organization in which people are invited to live as their word—by giving promises, making distinct requests, making declarations, making commitments—what gets stirred up is the question of being trustworthy or trusted. What bothers people is not the pressure of living as their word. What bothers them, rather, is the question of whether they are trustworthy. And trustworthiness is the wrong question. The question is not, "Are you trusted?" It is, "Are you committed?"

Werner Erhard and Associates is an example of an organization in which the question of trust is resolved when you join the staff. That trust does not wait for an accumulation of evidence. You are trusted by declaration. The validity of a declaration depends on its being said and being listened to.

If you can hear that you are trusted—if you can be a committed listener to that—then that issue is over. Your subsequent behavior, whatever it may be, shows up in the space of that trust. In the space of being trusted you now have the room to play a game called, "For what will I be accountable?" And the way you make yourself accountable is to make a promise.

Accountability is a matter of commitment. When you are called to account for something that you have promised, it feels threatening, because it's as if the question of your trust is at stake, when in fact what is at stake is your accountabilty.

Not keeping a promise is no sign of your trustworthiness or lack of it. In fact, very few people even notice the moment at which a promise starts being kept or not kept. You don't keep your promise immediately upon making it, do you? You make a promise. An instant later: You didn't keep it, did you? Yet? Again, the question is not one of your trustworthiness. It is one of commitment. Are you really committed to the promise you make? In other words, are you accountable?

You won't keep all your promises. If you're keeping all your promises, you aren't making what I'd call promises. Promising that there's a floor under your feet is not a promise. A promise implies a risk, and risk implies something less than a 100 percent certainty of a payoff. Obviously if it pays off 100 percent, there's no risk. That's playing it safe.

Now when some people see themselves not keeping promises, they revert to questions about trustworthiness: "Gee, because I didn't do it, I can't trust myself. So now I have to make smaller promises. Particularly to you I have to make smaller promises because I know you don't trust me, so I know you can't listen to any big promises." Do you see what happens? As your word, you've reduced yourself to someone smaller than you really are. And you make the kind of requests, the kind of commitments, the kind of promises, that a small person makes.

So we expand the notion of accountability. It is not merely, "Did you keep your promise?" It is, "What did you promise, and did you keep the promise?" And who are you in this matter? And what is the opportunity?

One can be all right without needing to prove it. All-right people extend themselves, put themselves out at the edge, risk not keeping all their promises. If you live as your word, you make promises, and if there is one you see you will not be able to keep, you make the declaration that you didn't meet the condition of satisfaction for that promise instead of waiting for somebody to come to tell you. "I promised to do this. I didn't do it," or, "I did do it."

If you make a promise, the moment that promise isn't real and honest-to-God for you, you revoke it. When it becomes some hope, it's no longer a promise. You may have to revoke some of your promises early in the game—if you're committed to living as your word.

There is never a justification for not keeping your promise. You are never justified. If you're making promises, you don't keep 100 percent of them. That justifies nothing. That's just the truth. And it's only the truth until you use it to justify something. Then it becomes just another excuse.

You see, a lot of people make promises and do not resolve the issue when they make the promise. They continue to worry about it, they stay concerned about it, they still have to perform a continuing operation on it.

When you get powerful at promising, the issue disappears in the moment of promising. It doesn't show up again until the moment of satisfaction or dissatisfaction—that is, the fulfillment or not—of the conditions of the promise. Meanwhile, you notice that you aren't carrying around considerations about promising. This may result in a breakdown if the promise isn't kept, but look at all the freedom you've had in the meantime.

Either you make a promise or you don't. Either you are committed and accountable or you aren't. Either you keep the promise or you don't. It is worth repeating that there is no justification in the world of promises. There is making promises and not making promises. And there is keeping promises and not keeping promises. And that's about the end of the story in that domain.

A few years ago, on my way to an evening meeting, I met a young woman who had just been killed in an accident. I did not know that she was dead, so I did what I could for her until I realized that there were no signs of life and I saw that the moisture on her open eyes was drying. The memory of that young woman stayed with me vividly all that evening, and she is with me now. Later that evening I watched the blood pulsing in another woman's throat as she slapped and scolded her child, and I screamed silently "Wake up! Be glad you're alive!" All of us have been given a precious gift of life—and how little we usually appreciate it. Thank you, dead woman of my memory, for waking me up and reminding me to life.

It is, therefore absurd to ask how influence and manipulation can be avoided, and we left with the inescapable responsibility of deciding for ourselves how this basic law of human communication may be obeyed in the most humane, ethical and effective manner. Paul Watzlawick

To Whom It May Concern in your Research Division

Scientific breakthroughs are invariably preceded/accompanied by the becoming conscious of and discarding previously unconscious erroneous/limiting assumptions.

The primary mechanism of maintaining these unconscious assumptions is the language which accompanies all our daily activities.

English like all natural ~~Tongues~~ (wild) languages is riddled with unconscious/incoherent/contradictory/etc. assumptions and just plain nonsense.

The history of science is littered with examples of years of truly inspired work prevented from resulting in practical application because of unconscious assumptions.

For most people, most of the time, most of their unconscious assumptions are ~~adequately~~ serviceable. But research/exploration is a very special human activity in which success results from penetrating under the assumptions that underly our perceptions/concepts of 'reality.'

Our attention is channeled by the language we think in.

Return to the text and circle all the words "the".
Replace them with "an" or "a" or nothing "( )"
Notice the dogmatism/exclusivity/finality/security/narrow-mindedness/even righteousness that accompanies its use.
Notice especially how different "a" or "an" feels tactily/emotionally.

It's not so much that we think in English but that we possess a language generating biological 'mechanism' inside our skulls. We too often unconsciously/uncritically accept as 'true' whatever we hear our language machine say on no further evidence than that ~~one~~ I said it.
"I", my mind, ~~my brain~~, my language machine are not "identical". I am not my language machine (mind?)
I have a language machine and occasionally I find it useful to monitor it closely and edit it diligently.
It's a quite "trainable/programmable ~~machine~~ system.

When we learned English, we learned ~~many of~~ the attitudes/values/world-view/philosophy (context) by which we make sense of life. But the roots of English are many tens of thousands of years old. It is riddled with incoherent/contradictory/out-of-date/just plain stupid assumptions about the nature of 'reality' imposed on us by our pre-literate, pre-historic, knuckle dragging ancestors. We pay the price for these assumptions in conflict/emotional tension/ It's truly amazes me sometimes that we accomplish anything at all considering the burdens we carry.

Dear Dennis,

I just wanted to drop you a line to inform you of everything I hate about you. First of all I hate your lack of self discipline. You can't even keep your word to yourself. Look at your fat, soft body. You are a food addict. You eat when you're feeling insecure or lonely or whatever not when your body needs nourishment. I hate how you won't allow yourself to get close to anyone. I hate your aloofness and air of superiority. Your delusions of grandeur. Calling yourself an agent of evolution and you can't even support yourself financially. All you talk about is self management, and look at yourself. No wonder nobody will buy your stuff. You're obviously full of shit. I hate the way you try to manipulate people for your own selfish interests. I hate the way that sex is always on your mind. Isn't it interesting how you can be sooo outgoing and helpful—to an attractive woman — a girl even — you don't give a shit about anything. I hate how fucking lazy you are. You spend the whole day sitting around at school bullshitting with people and trying to find a woman to fuck instead of doing the work you should be doing. Shit, you're not even clear about what work you should be doing. All you want to do is play. You don't really care about anyone but yourself. Shit, as you're writing this you're checking out every female that goes by. I don't even think your heart is in this process. I hate your anger and self-righteousness. You don't think that 'ordinary' people are good enough for you to spend your time with, unless, of course, you think there's something in it for you — like sex or money.

I hate that you can't even focus ~~[illegible]~~ now on all the things about yourself that are so hateful. Why has your mind gone blank now? I hate how you're such a fucking robot. Everything your mother does drives you crazy. You still can't get off it. I hate how you are afraid to put your ass out there. Your afraid of rejection and you know better than that. And you're always got an excuse or an explanation for why things are fucked up. You use 'responsibility' and 'choice' as a way to avoid seeing that you just fucked up. You think that you have to 'appear' to be in control at all times. You know that "you" isn't in control but you keep putting it on everyone else as some sort of answer. This whole page, so far, is bullshit. Your mind isn't on this.

I also hate how you repress your hate. You're having a hard time getting in touch with it now. You know it's there but you have blocked it off. Where's the fucking hate/anger. I hate how you waste time. I hate how you watch absolute crap on T.V. and then explain it as 'anthropological' research. I hate how passive and patient you are rather than going out and doing what needs to be done. You only do what's comfortable and fun and then wait for someone else to do the other necessary parts. I hate how you swear/promise you're going to do something and then don't do it, because it's too uncomfortable or whatever great excuse you have.

I hate how you've been fucking around for two years with all this talk about starting a school. You could have had it going by now if you weren't such a lazy asshole. I hate how you let 'obstacles' get in the way of you giving your gift to the world. I hate how you let your feelings of unworthiness prevent you from getting money. I hate how you sit around at the University day after day and don't produce any real results in the world. It's just a way of avoiding doing what needs to be done. I hate how you don't really care about other individuals. People who think you do care are fooled into mistaking technique for caring.

I'm afraid that I'm really just full of shit and can't really do any of the stuff I talk about. I'm afraid what I'm really cut out for is working for someone else so they can tell me what to do. I'm afraid I'm not really smart enough to be teaching anyone how to think. I'm afraid I've latched onto this save the Earth shit because my personal life is so empty and unsatisfying. I'm afraid that I might go on like this for ever — no making it. Living in illusion until I kill myself. I'm afraid that I'm really unworthy of success, money, love or anything I want. I'm afraid I'll spend the rest of my life on the verge of making it. Barely surviving, always struggling for money and recognition. I'm afraid I'll never break thru this barrier between me and reality. I'm afraid I'll get old and ugly and ill and friendless and die alone, having contributed nothing to Earth or any individual in Earth.

Dear Debbie,

I hate it that you threw me out of my little cabin because it was a little inconvenient for you. I hate your goddamn phony laced laugh you put on for you friends. I hate the stupid unconscious lying relationship you have with Glenn. I hate the way you beat Justin. I hate how you talk about taking care of your family when you know you're bigger than that. I hate the vacuum your kids are being brought up in. I hate how you won't talk about what you know needs to be talked about. I hate it how you ask questions such that you won't have to get any answers you don't want to hear. I hate how you avoided me since you told me to leave.

Crisis in Management

Sunday June 3

the division between "thinking" and "action" is a phony one. thinking is an action. One useful way of approaching this issue is for an individual to figure out the results in the world of his activities/thinking/behavior.

"I" exists/has its being totally within the domain of language

"I" is a symbolic being

When I say that I remember a particular color, (of a car, for e.g.) could I therefore mix that color now to perfection — am I actually recalling/experiencing the color now OR am I referring to an internal event of consciously 'noticing' a particular color — Do I 'remember' a 'color' or 'noticing'?

What difference does this make?
